Four women have survived together throughout the devastating blow to the USA by an arrogant military display of germ warfare that backfired. What was to have been a future weapon against our country's enemies has been deployed and aimed at our own country. These women maintain and hold a fortress of a compound that they just stumbled upon. Through trial and error they take a stand against an enemy, and one man wants it all, simply because it is there and being held by women. There is a demented evilness in the contaminated man. His name is Lindell and he will take lives for nothing more than his own pleasure. He is vile, and by all rights, he is a monster. He revels in blood and death. The "grip" has put a permanent stamp on him. There is no clear definition for him.

Hailed as our era's most profound theorist of literary influence, Harold Bloom's own influence on the landscape of literary criticism has been decisive. His wide-ranging critical writings have plumbed the depths of Romanticism, explored the anxiety caused by the influence of one generation of poets on another, wrestled with the idea of a literary canon, and examined the relationship between religion and literature. In this unprecedented full-length study on Harold Bloom, Agata Bielik-Robson explores the many facets of Bloom's critical writings and career. In his work, she argues, Bloom draws on a variety of disparate traditions—Judaism, Gnosis, romanticism, American pragmatism, and Freudianism, but also, especially recently, Victorian Aestheticism—that constitute a dialectical, difficult whole in constant quarrel with itself. The Saving Lie brings all these aspects of Bloom's thought together, revealing the organizing thread of "antithetical vitalism"
